In January 2025, the labor market showed mixed signals with a slight dip in the unemployment rate, though several key indicators remained stable or showed little change. Despite job gains, challenges such as long-term unemployment and part-time work for economic reasons continue to reflect underlying pressures in the workforce.

Job growth was notably concentrated in the health care, retail trade, and social assistance sectors, which collectively contributed to the overall gains. These trends reflect a broader pattern of slower growth in the labor market compared to the more robust figures seen in 2024.
